Excerpt: . . . the same sort of opportunities that are given to the forward in a forward tip-off. He may take a long shot for basket, he may carry the ball to the basket on a fast dribble, or he may pass it to one of his four teammates. These are the fundamental plays in basket-ball, and while there are numberless variations following the initial reception of the ball by either the forward or guard, four signals will take care of these four starting plays. It used to be a custom for the center to give the signal for each play. He might place his right hand on his right hip when the right forward was to receive the ball or might scratch his head with his right hand when the right guard was to receive the ball, or he might call a number. Some ten or twelve years ago the writer introduced a system which has been copied very extensively in signal giving, which was to have one of the forwards give the signal. This is a much better procedure, as the forward is not in a position to attract the attention of the opponents as readily as is the center. Signals are not so easily detected, and he is seen by all his teammates. The signals may be given with the hands, feet or head. As a suggestive measure let us take one group of signals: If the right foot is advanced the tip-off may be...
