Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: . follows: --(1) The Use of Benzine.--Assuredly lamps, which are well made and supplied with this fluid, yield incomparably-better light than lamps fed with vegetable oil, especially if one compares the lamps after they have been in use for several hours in dusty workings. Now it is known, and the British Royal Commission on Accidents in Mines long ago drew special attention to the fact, that good light is an essential element of safety in mines and a protection against innumerable accidents which have resulted in the sacrifice of many lives. Does not, however, the use of this highly-inflammable fluid diminish the degree of safety of the lamps in which it is burnt, by the overheating which it brings about and the inflammable atmosphere which is formed within the lamp itself? (2) The Suppression of the Exclusive Monopoly of the Mucselser Safety-lamp.--Are there really other lamps in existence possessing the same degree of safety as, or a greater degree of safety than, the Mueseler lamp? (3) Internal Ignition (r dig Ming).--The chief advantage of internal ignition, from the point of view of safety alone, is that it cuts off from the workman any temptation to open his lamp for the purpose of relighting it when in the workings. Resort is too often had to this reprehensible and most dangerous proceeding, despite special locks, careful inspection, and rigid fines, because the workman is anxious to avoid the delay, and consequent pecuniary loss, which is involved in replacing...
