Excerpt: . . . cherishing the germs of indignation at their treatment, and of contempt for their opinions. Meanwhile he resolved to show the lawyers, by a prompt and large distribution of rewards and punishments, that strenuous (ardent) and unblushing (effrontfi) servility, even when it was not crowned with success, was a sure title to his favour, and that whoever, after years of obsequiousness, ventured to act for one instant with courage and honesty, was guilty of an unpardonable offence. . VERBS. AUXILIARIES. Rule LIX. -- He was by trade a joiner, and was celebrated as the inventor of the Protestant flail (cassette). He had gone to Oxford when the Parliament sat there, and was accused of having planned a rising, and an attack on (contre) the kings guards. Pompey would have lost his army, if Metellus had not advanced to his help. Francis II. reigned less than two years. John Huss had already appeared twice before an assembly of doctors, who had separated without deciding anything. His friend was a French refugee-officer, who had been driven out of his native country at the time of the Protestant persecutions, and who had come to Cam 1 Fr. Pret. indef. bridge, where he taught fencing, and had opened a saloon-of-arms. Rule LX. --The very day that the general had arrived in London, there had been a fight between the cavalry and the infantry. I was afraid you would have arrived before me. I soon repented the words which had escaped...
