Excerpt: . . . nor hundreds nor tens of thousands, nor tens of units in this number (A) (a). We know now how to express by words and figures all numbers that can be formed, to write in figures those we can pronounce, and to express by words those we may see written in figures. c FOURTH LESSON. We have seen numbers formed by adding units to units, tens to tens, and hundreds to hundreds. Now let us suppose that we know two numbers, and that we wish or require to have their sum, to know the number formed on adding them together, the total number of things we know to exist at once, first in a group of one number, then in a group of another number (A). Suppose, for instance, that we have 13 things in one place and 26 in another, and that we want to...
